Ed Stelmach can't be trusted on climate change

Bumbling PC Leader goes into fulminating rage over Alberta Liberal climate change plan

Edmonton – Safely ensconced in his Tory bubble and staying away from real voters, bumbling PC Leader Ed Stelmach again repeated his fibs last night about the Alberta Liberal climate change plan.

Between foaming at the mouth and running down dead prime ministers at his Calgary speech last night, Stelmach again blurted out the nose-stretcher that the Alberta Liberal climate change action plan would cost over 300,000 jobs – essentially, every job in the oil sands energy sector.

The Alberta Liberal climate change action plan, announced in the first week of the campaign, would establish hard caps on industrial greenhouse-gas emissions in five years. It would also establish Alberta as a leader in the green economy, creating thousands of jobs in research, development and renewable energy.

At some point during the campaign, Stelmach must be held accountable for his fibs and disinformation on climate change, which he has yet to back up. That's what a real leader would do.

In related news, the Conservation Voters of Alberta rated the Alberta Liberals' platform the best of all the major parties this election with a grade of B+. The NDP and Green Party received a B, the PCs and Wildrose Alliance received a D.

The Conservation Voters of Alberta's full analysis of the parties' environmental platforms can be found here:

It's time for a change to get the job done right.
